syndrome and pregnancy. The antiphospholipid antibody syndrome is a heterogeneous disorder characterized by vascular thrombosis and/or obstetric complications associated with antiphospholipid antibody positivity. Fibrillar glomerulonephritis has rarely been reported in patients with this syndrome. Herein, we report the first case of fibrillar glomerulonephritis in a patient with antiphospholipid antibody syndrome and pregnancy. A 24-year-old pregnant woman with thrombocytopenia was examined, and renal biopsy showed nephrotic-range proteinuria with predominant microcystic changes and microhematuria. The patient had a high titer of antiphospholipid antibodies. The patient had two previous abortions and a third pregnancy resulting in a stillborn. Light microscopic examination revealed a diffuse nodular glomerulopathy, with predominant themesangial fibrillary deposits, with occasional spikes and globular structures. Electron microscopy showed abundant, small and medium-sized fibrils, and subendothelial electron-dense deposits. Immunofluorescence showed granular mesangial staining for immunoglobulin G, C3, kappa and lambda light chains, and absent staining for albumin. The patient received prednisone (60 mg/day) and aspirin (75 mg/day) during the pregnancy, and a Caesarean section resulted in a live female baby. Steroid therapy was continued after the delivery.
