Composition Algorithms - am ===== ianterrell I have a hard time imagining that a large number of people have any real interest in how they do compositing -- let alone any real interest in doing it in practice. It's been, what, 10 years since the iPhone happened? How many people would actually care about how a camera app assembles a photo of their girlfriend to create a background for the rest of the photo? Or how a paint app smears a canvas to create a painting? Most people who think about this stuff in any depth are compnerd types who love to geek-out over the mathematical properties of the algorithms and systems, but are far less interested in actually implementing them. One of the consequences is that you have circles of people writing rules and descriptions of their algorithms. There's even a comp-nerd community on Wikipedia for rules and descriptions of comp-nerd metaprogramming. Even if you believe that these systems are useful, you're just arguing about the design of comp-nerd systems, and those systems are on their way to being obsolete. The fundamentals of graphics and computer graphics are being understood, and the correct techniques will generally be known. The only comp-nerd systems that have any real lasting value are those that solve unique problems; an example is GIMP's "brighten and contrast" functionality, which was invented before the iPhone even existed. ~~~ hyuuu But if you have been using graphic programs for a decade, how do you know that the fundamentals of e79caf774b
